The Japanese movie Spirited Away is based on the Japanese folktale of the same name. The story follows a young girl named Chihiro who gets trapped in a dream-like world inhabited by talking animals and insect-like spirits. As she tries to find her way home, her new friends help her learn valuable lessons about friendship, family, and trust that she can take back with her into the real world. I've always loved this film, but I never fully understood what was happening in it until I watched it in English with subtitles after recently learning the language myself. If you're interested, this website has torrents for other foreign dubbed versions of this wonderful movie. <http://www.japantracker.org/movies/spirited-away-english> <http://www.piratebay.to/torrents-details.php?id=2347001&tname=movie131110151741741010> In the movie, Chihiro's name is written in kanji as "Chihiro" or 千尋 (in Chinese, same character). "Chihiro" has the same pronunciation as "Jiāo Hǎikǒu" (translated roughly to "Lonely Journey"), which is the name of the main character in the Chinese folktale The Journey to the West. While Spirited Away is not based on a Chinese folktale, but was instead inspired by it, there are some other references in the film to Chinese traditions, culture and mythology. In particular, the main character herself has a similar name to the Chinese girl making a journey to go save her mother from being taken away by a demon. In one of the characters' dialogue, he calls Chihiro a "Jiāo Hǎikǒu" (Chinese: 千尋之旅 "Jiāo Jiē nǚ"). The Japanese word phonetically sounds the same as "Jiao He Jiu" (translated as "Lonely Journey"), but as noted, this was not the title of the original folktale. There are two other references to the original folktale, which was originally titled "Jiao He Jiu" (simplified Chinese: 蛟河九; traditional Chinese: 蛟河九; pinyin: Jiāo Xiāng Nǚ) and "Jiache Robing Bixie" (simplified Chinese: 蛟河九; traditional Chinese: 蛟河九; pinyin: Jiāo Cáng Rúbǐxī).
